the team mascot's costume and don the outfit to become Youppi when needed.

"I repaired him part by part," he says. "Then they asked me to make a brand-new costume. The original had been intended for television, not for running around. It was difficult to clean and it had got to the point that you could smell when Youppi was coming."

With the newly made, washable Youppi, Jean-Claude travelled with the team for the next three years. As it turned out, he had a natural talent for performing as the costumed character. "I loved the job and had a great time travelling with the players, seeing costumes all over the U.S. and Canada," he says. "But I didn't know then that I was building a mascot business."

However, this was just what was happening, although his bank initially refused to give him a business loan. ("The banks actually laughed at me and my business idea," he recalls.) Instead, a second mascot assignment — to make a mascot and perform in the costume for a local radio station (the now-defunct CJMF) — gave him the start-up boost he needed.

He began his mascot business in the basement of his home, later moving to an office. "I slept in the office for two years," says Jean-Claude, explaining that his marriage broke under the strain associated with building his company. "At that time, being or building a mascot was not a job with any prestige. Also, the business took so much energy and I was gone with the team a lot of the time."
